POETRY.

From the Landon Keepsake for 1843. Jealonsy.

By Sir Edward Lytton Pulwer, Bart. I have thy love-I know no fear Of that divine possession-Yet draw more close, and thou shalt hear A jealous heart's confession.

I nurse no pang lest fairer youth *Or loftier hopes should win thee,-There blows no wind to chill the truth. Whose amaranth blooms within thee.

Unworthier thee if I could grow, (The love that lured thee perish'd,) Thy women-heart could ne'er forego The earliest dream it cherish'd.

I do not think that doubt and love Are one-whate'er they tell us, Yet-nay-lift not thy looks above, A star can make me jealous!

If thou are mine, all mine at last, I covet so the treasure. Wo glance that thou Sanst elsewhere cast, But robs me of a pleasure.

I am so much a miser grown, That I could wish to hide thee, Where nover breath but mine alone, Could drink delight beside thee ;--Then say not, with that soothing air.

I have no rival nigh thee-The sundeam lingering in thy bair-The breeze that trembles by theo-The very herb beneath thy feet-

The rose whose odors woo thee-

In all things rivals he must meet, Who would be all things to thee! If sonlight from the dial bo But for one moment banish'd,

The hours themselves are vanish'd ;-In aught that from me lures thine eyes, My jealousy has trial-The lightest cloud across the skies Has darkness for the dial.
